EXPLANATORY NOTE

Since the enactment of the Magna Carta for Public School Teachers in 1966, the state has been mandated to promote and improve the economic status of public school teachers and their living and working conditions. However, as it is a largely unfunded law, teachers have been waiting in vain for the benefits intended to somehow ease their hardships. During the deliberations for the 2011 budget, officials from the Department of Education admitted having their hands tied – many Magna Carta benefits cannot be promptly and regularly granted to teachers because of the perennial budget shortfall. These benefits are denied them, simply because of lack of funds.

This bill seeks to meet the avowed policy of the Magna Carta by uplifting the economic condition of teachers, through the provision of a non-wage benefit in the form of free tuition and other fees for their dependent children who are admitted to public post- secondary education institutions. By shouldering this cost, the government shall provide substantial economic relief for teachers, give due recognition for their dedication and hard work, and enhance the status of the teaching profession. A similar intention is behind the comparable benefit given to Barangay officials since 1991 in the Local Government Code (Republic Act 7160), but the coverage mandated in this bill is broader in that it provides free education in not only state universities and colleges but also public technical and vocational schools.

For these reasons, approval of this bill is earnestly sought.
