Explanatory Note

Section 15 of Article II under the 1987 Constitution mandates that the State shall protect and promote the right to health of the people and instill health consciousness among them. Unfortunately, recent data proved otherwise. According to a report from the Department of Science and Technology in 2008, thousands of women in the Philippines are diagnosed with some form of gynecologic cancer each year and it is estimated that about one-third of them will succumb to their disease.¹ This is a national tragedy magnified by the fact that the most common gynecologic cancers - ovarian, uterine, and cervical cancer - have five-year survival rates exceeding 90% when diagnosed at their earliest stages.

Because early detection and treatment often mean the difference between life and death, it is important to increase awareness of the factors that put certain women at a higher risk of gynecological cancer. Because symptoms of such are vague and non-specific, women and their physicians often attribute them to more common conditions so that by the time the disease is diagnosed the cancer has often spread.

Although development of a screening test to detect all these forms of gynecological cancer remains a very active area of research, currently there is no definitive prevention strategy, but having regular examinations may decrease the overall risk of dying from cancer. It is clearly in the interest of advancing the public health for this State to commit itself to a widespread and sustained effort to increase awareness of gynecologic cancer among the general public. While gynecologic cancers are often asymptomatic, awareness can lead to early detection and successful treatment.

In view of the foregoing, the passage of this bill is earnestly sought.
