EXPLANATORY NOTE

SEC 14, Article II of the Philippine Constitution explicitly stipulates the fundamental equality between women and men, recognizing the women's role in nation building. In response to the United Nations Decade for Women (1976-1985), which focused the world's attention on the situation of women as it brought to fore the various problems and issues confronting them in countries of various stages of development, the Philippine government ratified the United Nations Convention and the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, one of the most important documents that resulted from the Women's Decade.

However, Filipino women, like other women all over the world, still continue to share essentially the same burden. They are confronted by a legacy of structures of inequality that are reinforced by structures and perceptions that produce a seemingly unending cycle. This situation retards the pace of their personal development, relegates them largely to the reproductive spheres of life, affords them minimal chances or fails to harness their full potential for national development. This cycle must be broken if women are to be effectively mobilized for development (PLAN FRAMEWORK of the Philippine Plan for Gender-Responsive Development 1995-2025, National Commission on the Role of Filipino Women).

Because of the under-valuation of women's work, the tasks that are related to housework, child rearing and family care are largely taken for granted and perceived as minor functions that are once in a while given patronizing importance but are generally seen as "natural" functions that have no direct contributions to societal development.

This situation is carried over to the public economic domain where women are the last to be hired and the first to be fired while at the same time receiving unequal pay for work of equal value. In the private sector, the Department of Labor and Employment (DOLE) study shows a disparity of more than a thousand pesos per month between male and female workers, the gap increasing significantly from unskilled to managerial and supervisory levels (DOLE-Institute of Labor Studies, 1991).

Unequal pay is further aggravated by different access to opportunities. Studies have shown, for instance, the females tend to be given limited access, relative to males, to training opportunities and concomitantly to promotions. A DOLE-ILS study in 1991 found out that male workers receive training more frequently, have more fringe benefits, and are promoted more than often than female workers.

As the Philippines moves towards aiming for the full realization of gender-responsive development, legislation is needed to ensure that enabling mechanisms are created to fulfill the equality stipulated by the Constitution, as well the UN Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, which our government has committed to in its ratification.

The Bill seeks to be one such mechanism, as it seeks to amend certain provisions of the Labor Code by expanding the prohibited acts of discrimination against women on account of their gender.

In view of the foregoing, the immediate approval of this bill is sought in earnest.
