EXPLANATORY NOTE

The key to effective and relevant government policy is open consultation where people's opinions are heard and channels are open to participative governance. There is, however, a limit to participation in governance, and a line should be drawn where consultation ends and the possibility of interference begins.

When a non-government entity occupies a portion of a government office, the physical closeness creates an impression of intimacy and the possibility of mutual influence. This simple presence of a non-government entity also operates as the government's unintentional endorsement for whatever purpose of the non-government entity. More importantly, communications, or even private information or confidential documents in the custody of government offices should be protected and secured at all times.

This measure prohibits the actual occupation by non-government entities of government office premises, as well as the provision of any material support by the government to the offices of these non-government entities. Without necessarily creating an impression of distrust or skepticism, this measure merely ensures that the interest of the government is protected.

In view of the foregoing, the passage of this bill is earnestly urged.
