EXPLANATORY NOTE

Since 2010, much has been achieved in the drive against corruption in the public service. Government is slowly regaining the trust and confidence of the citizenry, after years of being cast under a long shadow of doubt.

The 2013 Global Corruption Barometer of Transparency International affirms this, showing that the Philippines was among a handful of countries where comparatively more people reported that they believe corruption in their society has decreased—some 37 percent of Filipino respondents.

However, the same survey reveals that a little more than 6 out of 10 Filipinos believe that the level of corruption has either stayed the same or actually increased. While current anti-corruption initiatives have already made headway, much more remains to be done.

But hope resides in everyday citizens. The survey also pinpoints that 3 out of 4 Filipino respondents believed that ordinary people could make a difference in the fight against corruption, with 84 percent expressing their willingness to engage in any anti-corruption activity.

Government must leverage this civic spirit, especially toward realizing Section 11, Article 1 of the Philippine Constitution, stating that public office is a public trust. It carries the obligation to craft and implement a framework that enables, even incentivizes, citizens to contribute in exposing any government misconduct.

The proposed measure institutionalizes such a framework by defining the security, protection and benefits afforded to whistleblowers.

By enabling citizens to speak up about any wrongdoing in the government, this measure adds to other mechanisms already in place that help restore credibility, integrity and accountability in public service.
