EXPLANATORY NOTE

Chronic diseases, defined as any condition that requires regular medical attention or medication, are the leading causes of death and disability for women in the country. According to the 2003 Health Statistics from the Department of Health (DOH), the five leading causes of death among Filipina women are heart disease, cancer, diabetes, pneumonia and unintentional injuries. Poor diet, physical inactivity, tobacco use, and alcohol abuse are the health risk behaviors that most often lead to disease, premature death, and disability, and are particularly prevalent among women. High poverty rates coupled with barriers to health preventive services and medical care contribute to disparities in health factors.

There is increasing evidence that early life experiences are associated with adult chronic disease and that prevention and intervention services provided within the community and the home may lessen the impact of chronic outcomes, while strengthening families and communities. Community health workers, who are primarily women, can be a critical component in conducting health promotion and disease prevention efforts in medically underserved populations.

Recognizing the difficult barriers confronting medically underserved communities (poverty, geographic isolation, language and cultural differences, lack of transportation, low literacy, and lack of access to services), community health workers are in a unique position to reduce preventable morbidity and mortality, improve the quality of life, and increase the utilization of available preventive health services for community members. Thus, there is a need to provide grants to community health workers to empower them in promoting positive health behaviors among women and children.¹
