SENATE S. B. No. 1539 meetiven by:

Introduced by Senator Juan Ponce Enrile

EXPLANATORY NOTE

A government should be under the rule of law and not of men. To maintain peaceful governance under the rule of law, the state should have an effective justice system, which includes, among other elements, an impartial tribunal, ready representation for the accused, and a competent prosecuting arm on behalf of the state and its people.

In our country, the National Prosecution Service (NPS) is the prosecution arm of the Department of Justice (DOJ). Its members, the public prosecutors, are the ones who stand before our Courts of Justice to represent the People and the aggrieved in a criminal case. Therefore, for better service of criminal justice, public prosecutors must be of certain caliber to better meet the expectations of the People and the wronged individuals whose rights they represent.

Recruitment of good legal practitioners is not an easy task for the DOJ, due to several factors. A public prosecutor has a heavy workload, composed not only of criminal cases but also of family law cases which they handle as deputized by and on behalf of the Office of the Solicitor General. Moreover, it is a fact that government service is not as lucrative as private practice. But to aggravate this deterrent, prosecutors face a greater risk to their persons and their family whenever they are given sensitive and controversial cases, as he or she, in the effort of protecting the cause of the complainant and the people, may suffer the ire of the defendant.

In the past three years, the DOJ was said to fill up more than 200 vacant positions in the NPS in order to cope with the deluge of cases averaging around 400,000 per year. However, it was said that the NPS still needs more than 600 prosecutors and about 150 support staff in order to be more effective in their duties.

Sheer strength in numbers is not sufficient in order to have a competent prosecuting arm. It is also important that there is an efficient organization which houses the worthy individuals chosen as public prosecutors. It is for this purpose that this Bill is presented — to improve the quantity and quality of recruitment in the National Prosecution Service by the creation of a Screening Board, and strengthen the organization by creating new positions, as well as realigning those positions that are already existing.

This Bill seeks to be a tool to improve the speedy dispensation of justice in our country. In view of the foregoing, the immediate passage of the Bill is earnestly sought.
