S. NO. 396

EXPLANATORY NOTE

In a report by the United Nations Development Program's Human Development Index, Philippines is among developing countries that are "dynamic adopters" in terms of technological achievements and capacities. Moreover, 2003 World Competitiveness Yearbook of the IMD noted that the Philippines has been one of the few countries losing its technically trained people to the United States. It said that between 1994 and 1995, some 57,000 Filipinos who hold higher education degrees were "imported" by the U.S. The average is nearly a thousand highly skilled individuals per year.

Every year, more than 800,000 Filipinos leave for jobs abroad and the share of persons with higher education or with sophisticated technical skills has been growing in recent years. The Philippine economy benefits substantially from these through dollar remittances of Filipinos employed abroad. However, although remittances are significant source of foreign exchange, the money is typically spent on consumer goods and adds little to an economy's productive capacity.

The proposed bill aims to tap the expertise of the overseas Filipino professionals to help accelerate economic development of the country in order to meet the goals for the next millennium. It provides for the methodologies by which these overseas Filipinos may effectively assist in Philippine development, notably in the areas of transfer and exchange of technology. Moreover, it is worth mentioning that their desire to come back to their land of birth is coupled with a desire to contribute their share in the development and progress of the country. Hence, by allowing them to practice in the Philippines, we give them an opportunity to render service to the country where their skills and expertise will be most needed and welcomed.

Early cognizance of this bill is earnestly sought.
