- In 1946, the House of Representatives was virtually a male enclave as there was only one woman member out of 96 men.
- In the $12^{\text {th }}$ Congress that began in 2001, 18 percent of the members of the House of Representatives were women. However, the results of the 2004 elections saw a decline by three percent.
- With only 15 percent of women composing its House of Representatives, the Philippines falls below the Asian regional average of 16.3 percent $^{1}$ membership in the Lower House.

- In other countries, women still face an uphill climb in gaining seats in parliaments.
- Women from the Nordic countries enjoy 40 percent membership in their parliaments while those from Arab states have a mere 7.8 percent.

- Nearly seven out of ten women who were elected to the House of Representatives in 2001 are members of political clans. A small number come from party-list organizations and other affiliations.
- In general, there are more women than men in the bureaucracy.
- While the women comprise the majority ( $76.5 \%$ ) in the second level or rank and file positions, the men predominantly occupy the third or executive level positions (4.4\%).
- First or clerical level positions are also a male bastion (40.6\%), almost double the number of women ( $22.6 \%$ ).
